America's Children Are NOT Suffering From Drug Deficiencies

Every year millions of children are put on drugs (like Ritalin) for ADHD. Children with learning problems don't need drugs, they need better nutrition

Judging by the statistics, one would think that America suffers from an epidemic of childhood learning problems. The number of children being diagnosed with attention deficit hyperactive disorder (ADHD) has increased about four percent every year, making it the number one mental health concern for children.

According to 2010 statistics, 5.3 million children between the ages of three and seventeen were diagnosed with ADHD, which is 8.6% of the nation's children. Boys are diagnosed as having ADHD more than girls, with 12% of America's boys and 5% of American girls being labeled with this problem.

There is no question that more children are having problems in school, but many people are questioning the wisdom of drugging children to solve it. For starters, some feel that normal childhood behavior is being inadvertently diagnosed as ADHD by over-anxious parents and doctors. Many parents have reported teachers pressuring them to medicate their children because the teacher finds them difficult to manage. Whatever the cause, 60% of all children diagnosed with ADHD receive medications, with Ritalin continuing to be the most popular. What many people fail to realize is that Ritalin and other drugs used to treat ADHD are amphetamines, which are "uppers," drugs in the same class as cocaine. These dangerous drugs are being pushed on children even though the National Institutes of Health Consensus Conference issued the following statement regarding ADHD: "We do not have an independent, valid test for ADHD, and there is no data to indicate that ADHD is due to a brain malfunction."
